

Hello!

I understand this is somewhat odd, as I haven't dragged you out onto a webpage in quite some time, but I think there's fairly decent reason for it.

For starters, I intend to apologize for something that I don't think we want to infect the new #general with much more of. And, I plan to talk somewhat specifically (without actually mentioning what specifically was done, much like we did last Friday), which would certainly run counter to what we're doing.

And, before we get any further, I'd like to apologize for reminding you of what happened. I don't intend to go into the details, but I will say that it wouldn't have happened had I never mentioned it. It was not something you ever approached. In fact, you were only ever wary before you realized it was something you didn't like.

I'm sure you don't need me to tell you how you feel on the matter. All the same, you said something to me last Friday that made me want to remind you: you did not approach the idea. I approached you with that content in mind.

In fact, I'd like to go a step further. You called what we did a "horrible mistake." Perhaps the word "horrible" wasn't used, but that was what it felt like. And, to be clear, I do not disagree in the slightest.

I could offer you an explanation, say that my ex made me feel very certain ways that caused me to drag that period with me for a while. I also know that that wouldn't change what happened though, and what my ideas caused us to do.

All I can do is move forward with the knowledge of what happened and my part in that. And apologize.

I am sorry for causing you to take part in that. It didn't particularly help me, and it hurt you.

It feels weird to end on that note, so I'll say one more thing. Thank you for allowing me someone to talk to. I am not a "social animal" in the way that everyone else is, and having someone willing to work with my particular set of oddities has been nice, especially when I can be rather... illogical, to put it nicely.